

MAKING GIRLS GREEK GODDESSES

ISADORE DUNCAN Tries to Realize Antique Ideals by Taking Absolute Charge of Pupils' Lives—America Ignored Her, and Germany Accepted Her.

BY FLORENCE DAVIES.

DANCING in Berlin one day, over four years ago, Isadora Duncan, the American girl who has conquered the grace of motion, caught sight of the eager face of a beautiful young American girl leaning far forward in her seat and following her every movement.

On and on the artist danced, now to some mad song of youth, now to the love music of Chopin, and now to the majestic poetry of Beethoven, but always the eyes of the American girl were following her.

Forgetting the rest of her audience, the dancer danced only to the American girl, and when in the enthusiasm of their applause the audience rushed toward the stage, the artist pulled a rose from the wreath which bound her hair and tossed it to the girl she had danced to.

"That was the beginning of a very warm friendship between myself and Isadora Duncan," said a Cleveland girl the other day, "for it was to me that she had thrown the rose."

"When, a few days later, a mutual friend took me to one of the 'at homes' of Miss Duncan, which were then very popular in Berlin, Miss Duncan did not wait for me to be presented to her, but as soon as she caught sight of my face she held out her hand and said:

"And so this is the girl that I danced to the other day!"

"After that I was often at her apartments in Hardenberger Strasse, and almost always at her at homes, which she gave at regular intervals throughout the winter.

"Those at homes, by the way, were exceedingly characteristic of Miss Duncan. Everyone came to them whom she liked, and who liked her.

"What matter if struggling students, hollow-eyed artists and poor little players rubbed elbows with dukes and grand personages who came to pay her court? She was as gracious to one as to the other.

"Her costumes on these occasions were, as on every other occasion, the simple Grecian dress."

"When Miss Duncan goes on the street, if the weather is cold, she wears over her Grecian dress a warm cloak and encases her sandalled feet in little fur shoes. But in the house she wears on her feet only the Grecian sandals, and her dress is of soft white material such as velvet or crepe de chine.

Of course, everyone knows that Miss Duncan is an American girl, and that she learned to dance as a little girl in her mother's dancing school. But her mother was a mere teacher of steps. It was not long before the pupil outstripped the teacher. To her, dancing was something more than a mere combination of steps. It was poetry, music, color, life, all expressed in terms of motion.

MISS DUNCAN'S FIRST DEPARTURE FROM CONVENTIONAL DRESS

perfect bodily freedom and untrammelled action, would degenerate into a sensuous thing void of purity and beauty if the conception of that beauty were not first in the mind of the artist.

For this reason Miss Duncan resolved that if the movement was to grow, it should be under her own guidance and direction. If girls were to learn to express beauty, they must have beauty within them to express. Were she to train them at all she would train not only the feet of her dancers but the minds and hearts as well, so that their mastery of motion should never be put to spurious, unlovely uses. She would teach them more than dancing; she would teach them life.

Has Absolute Charge of Children.

To do this Miss Duncan did a very daring thing. She opened a school to which only those children whose parents would relinquish all control of them while at her school should be allowed to come. She would begin with them when they were eight years old, and keep them under her direction for a period of years until they had learned the thing that she wanted to teach them.

And yet the school is full. With the exception of the two little daughters of Humperdinck, the composer of Hueland and Gretchen, the children's opera given every Christmas in Berlin, she has no day pupils. The children all live at her beautiful villa in the fairy land of the Grunewald.

Close to her villa she has built a Greek open air theater, where she and her pupils give performances and learn to give Grecian dances and plays.

But why, one asks, if Miss Duncan is an American, should she found her school and establish her home in Germany?

The answer is simple enough. America was not ready for her art when she was ready to give it.

Five or six years ago, when she was in America, she danced only to a few persons, who appreciated what she was trying to do. She gave studio dances and entertained the guests of a few wealthy women. But no reputable orchestra leader would engage her as soloist.

The Americans were shy of that Grecian costume and those bare feet, and come what would, they didn't intend to be shocked. They didn't mind lights and tinsel and tightrope walkers, and a few of these innocent little vaudeville entertainers, but bare feet—my, oh, my, never!

So Miss Duncan went to Germany where the people have lived with the artistic and the beautiful long enough to have got used to them and they hailed her as a great artist.

Five years ago the two most talked of women in Germany were Americans. One was Geraldine Harrar, and the other was Isadora Duncan.

Great artists painted Miss Duncan's picture. One of the leading sculptors in Berlin made a statue in bronze of one of her poses and sold it for $2,000.

So pleased was Miss Duncan with the statue that one of her admirers paid the sculptor $500 to make a small replica of it, which he presented to her and which now stands in her dancing room in Berlin. On this page is shown one of the photographs of the replica.

And now, after Europe has given the sign and America has decided that it is really all right after all, Miss Duncan is dancing with Damrosch and calling back musicians and dancers after the last number on the program.

PAINT FOR RADIATORS.

Whether painting radiators has any effect on heating is a problem of much interest. A practical investigation has been reported by John R. Allen to the American Society of Heating and Ventilating Engineers, and has brought to notice the influence of various kinds of paint.

The transmission of heat was found to be about the same with fourteen coats of paint as with two, the effect produced seeming to depend upon the last coat applied. It is concluded that the condition of the surface affects the heating more than the material through which the heat is conducted, but the vehicle carrying the pigment has some influence.

Copper bronze and shellac gave better results than copper bronze and linseed oil. Copper and aluminum bronzes seemed to be the poorest coverings, enamel the best materials tried, but lead and zinc paints transmitted heat very nearly as well as the enamels.

THE NEWEST PORTABLE WIRELESS.

The automobile wireless telegraph station of the French army resembles an ordinary limousine in appearance, weighs 7,200 pounds with a crew of six men, can be driven twenty-six miles an hour on a level by its twenty-two-horse power motor, and can be made ready for operation in six minutes, the normal radius of action being more than ninety miles.

The rear of the two compartments of the car contains a five-horse power dynamo, the receiver and the operating key. A telescopic mast, consisting of a number of concentric metal tubes ten feet long, is raised to a height of sixty-six feet in a few seconds, the five antenna wires—each 180 feet long—being attached to its top, the lower end of four being insulated from the ground and the fifth passing to the receiver.

Queer Stunts with a Whip

FRED LINDSEY'S WHIP EXPERT.

Here's a Man Who Uses the Lash as a Knife, a Pistol, a Lasso, a Pair of Hand-cuffs and a Lot of Other Things.

ONE of the weapons not included in the Roosevelt hunting equipment was a long Australian bushwhacker's stock whip. But the strenuous former chief executive did not leave for the African jungles without having demonstrated unusual enthusiasm for the possibilities of the bull whip. Mr. Roosevelt spent the larger part of an afternoon being entertained with the possibilities of the long twenty-five-foot whip as skillfully snapped and lashed by Fred Lindsey, an Australian ranch owner who comes to the Hippodrome this week.

JUST TWO MEN BRAVE ENOUGH TO GO HATLESS

THE first season of Broker E. M. Baker's self-imposed martyrdom is over. Not that Mr. Baker has considered himself martyred. He has not. So, therefore, he is not a martyr, though his friends have been inclined to view in that light his determination to go without a hat.

Baker was hatless all summer. The fact that now, when the frost is on the hen-coop and winds blow chill—the fact that Baker now wears a hat must not be taken to mean that he has been compelled to retreat from the position he took when roses were in bloom. He has not backslid. He—but let Baker explain.

First, however, it shall be recorded here on this fair page that Harrison McGraw, who is an actor, and who started out the season with his hair all in a row on the top shelf of the back closet, is wearing one again. Baker is inclined to think that McGraw, who started out so well and with such fine resolution, is—Baker hates to say it, but he can't help but believe that McGraw is a backslider.

The young woman in McGraw's office in the Citizens building, where she makes ragtime on a typewriter, defends McGraw against this accusation. She says McGraw faithfully abstained from hats all summer, and that it was only a few days ago that he began wearing one again. Mr. Baker, advised of these facts, said that he would be very sorry to do McGraw an injustice. If McGraw is still faithful no one, says Baker, will be more glad than Baker himself.

Looks Bad for McGraw.

The young woman may be quite right, but appearances, all must admit, are against McGraw. It was several days before the first frost, it was while sweet corn was still in the ear, and while the paw-paws yet swung green in the September haze, that McGraw began to wear a hat.

The season was not over.

At the start we wrote that some of Baker's friends were inclined to regard him as a martyr. This was true only of some of them. Others were inclined to believe that Baker was losing his mind. It was such a highly cultivated mind that they were sorry to think of him losing it.

Mr. Baker had been educated as a rabbi. The love of ages was as familiar to him as the batting averages of American league players are to some of the rest of us.

At times, in Rabbi Gries' absence, Baker has been called upon to fill his place at The Temple.

Not long ago Baker was chairman of the Republican committee. His manner has been rational. He has climbed no lamp posts. He has never sat on a chimney and announced that he was a bird. In short, and let us be brief—nothing is more displeasing to a reader than to be led rambling all about a point—to be brief, then, let me say that Baker has shown no signs of a tottering mind. Yet in no other way could many of his friends explain his determination to wear no hat.

Baker's Friends Warned Him.

They explained to him carefully that people had been sent out to see Dr. Clark for merely refusing to wear clothes. They pointed out that only gentlemen with whiskers could safely dispense with neckties. They admitted that Baker still wore neckties. In fact, they said, they could not imagine him without a necktie. They had never known him to come to the stock exchange without his shoes, in a decollete suit of pink underwear. If he stopped at going without a hat—if he felt sure he had the strength of character to stop his impulse to go without things where it was—all might be well.

They tried to humor him. They suggested that he wear a little hat. If he would wear just a little hat—it need be no larger than a hat for a boy—if he would just wear such a hat, they said, he might in time accustom himself to it and soon be wearing a regular hat like other brokers.

They were on the wrong tack. They who thought Baker's mind was falling were no more right than were those who thought Baker was a martyr. Like the gardeners in India who sit on picket fences to acquire merit, J. E. Lightner, a stationer and dealer in wall paper and pianos at Palmersville—him to come to the stock exchange without his shoes, in a decollete suit of pink underwear. If he stopped at going without a hat—if he felt sure he had the strength of character to stop his impulse to go without things where it was—all might be well.

They tried to humor him. They suggested that he wear a little hat. If he would wear just a little hat—it need be no larger than a hat for a boy—if he would just wear such a hat, they said, he might in time accustom himself to it and soon be wearing a regular hat like other brokers.

They were on the wrong tack. They who thought Baker's mind was falling were no more right than were those who thought Baker was a martyr. Like the gardeners in India who sit on picket fences to acquire merit, J. E. Lightner, a stationer and dealer in wall paper and pianos at Palmersville—him to come to the stock exchange without his shoes, in a decollete suit of pink underwear. If he stopped at going without a hat—if he felt sure he had the strength of character to stop his impulse to go without things where it was—all might be well.

They tried to humor him. They suggested that he wear a little hat. If he would wear just a little hat—it need be no larger than a hat for a boy—if he would just wear such a hat, they said, he might in time accustom himself to it and soon be wearing a regular hat like other brokers.

They were on the wrong tack. They who thought Baker's mind was falling were no more right than were those who thought Baker was a martyr. Like the gardeners in India who sit on picket fences to acquire merit, J. E. Lightner, a stationer and dealer in wall paper and pianos at Palmersville—him to come to the stock exchange without his shoes, in a decollete suit of pink underwear. If he stopped at going without a hat—if he felt sure he had the strength of character to stop his impulse to go without things where it was—all might be well.

They tried to humor him. They suggested that he wear a little hat. If he would wear just a little hat—it need be no larger than a hat for a boy—if he would just wear such a hat, they said, he might in time accustom himself to it and soon be wearing a regular hat like other brokers.

They were on the wrong tack. They who thought Baker's mind was falling were no more right than were those who thought Baker was a martyr. Like the gardeners in India who sit on picket fences to acquire merit, J. E. Lightner, a stationer and dealer in wall paper and pianos at Palmersville—him to come to the stock exchange without his shoes, in a decollete suit of pink underwear. If he stopped at going without a hat—if he felt sure he had the strength of character to stop his impulse to go without things where it was—all might be well.

They tried to humor him. They suggested that he wear a little hat. If he would wear just a little hat—it need be no larger than a hat for a boy—if he would just wear such a hat, they said, he might in time accustom himself to it and soon be wearing a regular hat like other brokers.

They were on the wrong tack. They who thought Baker's mind was falling were no more right than were those who thought Baker was a martyr. Like the gardeners in India who sit on picket fences to acquire merit, J. E. Lightner, a stationer and dealer in wall paper and pianos at Palmersville—him to come to the stock exchange without his shoes, in a decollete suit of pink underwear. If he stopped at going without a hat—if he felt sure he had the strength of character to stop his impulse to go without things where it was—all might be well.

They tried to humor him. They suggested that he wear a little hat. If he would wear just a little hat—it need be no larger than a hat for a boy—if he would just wear such a hat, they said, he might in time accustom himself to it and soon be wearing a regular hat like other brokers.

They were on the wrong tack. They who thought Baker's mind was falling were no more right than were those who thought Baker was a martyr. Like the gardeners in India who sit on picket fences to acquire merit, J. E. Lightner, a stationer and dealer in wall paper and pianos at Palmersville—him to come to the stock exchange without his shoes, in a decollete suit of pink underwear. If he stopped at going without a hat—if he felt sure he had the strength of character to stop his impulse to go without things where it was—all might be well.

They tried to humor him. They suggested that he wear a little hat. If he would wear just a little hat—it need be no larger than a hat for a boy—if he would just wear such a hat, they said, he might in time accustom himself to it and soon be wearing a regular hat like other brokers.

with one lash; securely tying the hands of an opponent, and he adds that he has frequently "lashed" a kangaroo running at full speed.

Mr. Lindsey advocates the adoption of the bushwhacker's whip as a standard athletic event. Every muscle in the body is put into vigorous play by use of the whip, and in addition careful "handwork" and keen eyesight are needed. Lindsey does not look upon his work as anything much out of the ordinary. He says that there are hundreds of ranchmen in Australia who are as skillful as he.

Mr. Lindsey is a rich man even when gauged by American standards. He owns vast properties in Australia, East Uganda, Africa and he has a valuable home in London. His appearance on the stage is merely a matter of amusement and excitement with him. He likes to travel, and his Scotch ancestry has given him the principle that it is better to travel profitably than at great expense. He became a showman through the attention he attracted with his whip while serving with an Australian regiment in the Boer war. His fame was carried to England at the close of the war and before he left south Africa he was offered extensive vaudeville engagements.

Mr. Lindsey is a rich man even when gauged by American standards. He owns vast properties in Australia, East Uganda, Africa and he has a valuable home in London. His appearance on the stage is merely a matter of amusement and excitement with him. He likes to travel, and his Scotch ancestry has given him the principle that it is better to travel profitably than at great expense. He became a showman through the attention he attracted with his whip while serving with an Australian regiment in the Boer war. His fame was carried to England at the close of the war and before he left south Africa he was offered extensive vaudeville engagements.

Mr. Lindsey is a rich man even when gauged by American standards. He owns vast properties in Australia, East Uganda, Africa and he has a valuable home in London. His appearance on the stage is merely a matter of amusement and excitement with him. He likes to travel, and his Scotch ancestry has given him the principle that it is better to travel profitably than at great expense. He became a showman through the attention he attracted with his whip while serving with an Australian regiment in the Boer war. His fame was carried to England at the close of the war and before he left south Africa he was offered extensive vaudeville engagements.

Mr. Lindsey is a rich man even when gauged by American standards. He owns vast properties in Australia, East Uganda, Africa and he has a valuable home in London. His appearance on the stage is merely a matter of amusement and excitement with him. He likes to travel, and his Scotch ancestry has given him the principle that it is better to travel profitably than at great expense. He became a showman through the attention he attracted with his whip while serving with an Australian regiment in the Boer war. His fame was carried to England at the close of the war and before he left south Africa he was offered extensive vaudeville engagements.

Mr. Lindsey is a rich man even when gauged by American standards. He owns vast properties in Australia, East Uganda, Africa and he has a valuable home in London. His appearance on the stage is merely a matter of amusement and excitement with him. He likes to travel, and his Scotch ancestry has given him the principle that it is better to travel profitably than at great expense. He became a showman through the attention he attracted with his whip while serving with an Australian regiment in the Boer war. His fame was carried to England at the close of the war and before he left south Africa he was offered extensive vaudeville engagements.

Mr. Lindsey is a rich man even when gauged by American standards. He owns vast properties in Australia, East Uganda, Africa and he has a valuable home in London. His appearance on the stage is merely a matter of amusement and excitement with him. He likes to travel, and his Scotch ancestry has given him the principle that it is better to travel profitably than at great expense. He became a showman through the attention he attracted with his whip while serving with an Australian regiment in the Boer war. His fame was carried to England at the close of the war and before he left south Africa he was offered extensive vaudeville engagements.

Mr. Lindsey is a rich man even when gauged by American standards. He owns vast properties in Australia, East Uganda, Africa and he has a valuable home in London. His appearance on the stage is merely a matter of amusement and excitement with him. He likes to travel, and his Scotch ancestry has given him the principle that it is better to travel profitably than at great expense. He became a showman through the attention he attracted with his whip while serving with an Australian regiment in the Boer war. His fame was carried to England at the close of the war and before he left south Africa he was offered extensive vaudeville engagements.

Mr. Lindsey is a rich man even when gauged by American standards. He owns vast properties in Australia, East Uganda, Africa and he has a valuable home in London. His appearance on the stage is merely a matter of amusement and excitement with him. He likes to travel, and his Scotch ancestry has given him the principle that it is better to travel profitably than at great expense. He became a showman through the attention he attracted with his whip while serving with an Australian regiment in the Boer war. His fame was carried to England at the close of the war and before he left south Africa he was offered extensive vaudeville engagements.

Mr. Lindsey is a rich man even when gauged by American standards. He owns vast properties in Australia, East Uganda, Africa and he has a valuable home in London. His appearance on the stage is merely a matter of amusement and excitement with him. He likes to travel, and his Scotch ancestry has given him the principle that it is better to travel profitably than at great expense. He became a showman through the attention he attracted with his whip while serving with an Australian regiment in the Boer war. His fame was carried to England at the close of the war and before he left south Africa he was offered extensive vaudeville engagements.

Mr. Lindsey is a rich man even when gauged by American standards. He owns vast properties in Australia, East Uganda, Africa and he has a valuable home in London. His appearance on the stage is merely a matter of amusement and excitement with him. He likes to travel, and his Scotch ancestry has given him the principle that it is better to travel profitably than at great expense. He became a showman through the attention he attracted with his whip while serving with an Australian regiment in the Boer war. His fame was carried to England at the close of the war and before he left south Africa he was offered extensive vaudeville engagements.

Mr. Lindsey is a rich man even when gauged by American standards. He owns vast properties in Australia, East Uganda, Africa and he has a valuable home in London. His appearance on the stage is merely a matter of amusement and excitement with him. He likes to travel, and his Scotch ancestry has given him the principle that it is better to travel profitably than at great expense. He became a showman through the attention he attracted with his whip while serving with an Australian regiment in the Boer war. His fame was carried to England at the close of the war and before he left south Africa he was offered extensive vaudeville engagements.

Mr. Lindsey is a rich man even when gauged by American standards. He owns vast properties in Australia, East Uganda, Africa and he has a valuable home in London. His appearance on the stage is merely a matter of amusement and excitement with him. He likes to travel, and his Scotch ancestry has given him the principle that it is better to travel profitably than at great expense. He became a showman through the attention he attracted with his whip while serving with an Australian regiment in the Boer war. His fame was carried to England at the close of the war and before he left south Africa he was offered extensive vaudeville engagements.

Mr. Lindsey is a rich man even when gauged by American standards. He owns vast properties in Australia, East Uganda, Africa and he has a valuable home in London. His appearance on the stage is merely a matter of amusement and excitement with him. He likes to travel, and his Scotch ancestry has given him the principle that it is better to travel profitably than at great expense. He became a showman through the attention he attracted with his whip while serving with an Australian regiment in the Boer war. His fame was carried to England at the close of the war and before he left south Africa he was offered extensive vaudeville engagements.

Mr. Lindsey is a rich man even when gauged by American standards. He owns vast properties in Australia, East Uganda, Africa and he has a valuable home in London. His appearance on the stage is merely a matter of amusement and excitement with him. He likes to travel, and his Scotch ancestry has given him the principle that it is better to travel profitably than at great expense. He became a showman through the attention he attracted with his whip while serving with an Australian regiment in the Boer war. His fame was carried to England at the close of the war and before he left south Africa he was offered extensive vaudeville engagements.

Mr. Lindsey is a rich man even when gauged by American standards. He owns vast properties in Australia, East Uganda, Africa and he has a valuable home in London. His appearance on the stage is merely a matter of amusement and excitement with him. He likes to travel, and his Scotch ancestry has given him the principle that it is better to travel profitably than at great expense. He became a showman through the attention he attracted with his whip while serving with an Australian regiment in the Boer war. His fame was carried to England at the close of the war and before he left south Africa he was offered extensive vaudeville engagements.

Mr. Lindsey is a rich man even when gauged by American standards. He owns vast properties in Australia, East Uganda, Africa and he has a valuable home in London. His appearance on the stage is merely a matter of amusement and excitement with him. He likes to travel, and his Scotch ancestry has given him the principle that it is better to travel profitably than at great expense. He became a showman through the attention he attracted with his whip while serving with an Australian regiment in the Boer war. His fame was carried to England at the close of the war and before he left south Africa he was offered extensive vaudeville engagements.

Mr. Lindsey is a rich man even when gauged by American standards. He owns vast properties in Australia, East Uganda, Africa and he has a valuable home in London. His appearance on the stage is merely a matter of amusement and excitement with him. He likes to travel, and his Scotch ancestry has given him the principle that it is better to travel profitably than at great expense. He became a showman through the attention he attracted with his whip while serving with an Australian regiment in the Boer war. His fame was carried to England at the close of the war and before he left south Africa he was offered extensive vaudeville engagements.

Mr. Lindsey is a rich man even when gauged by American standards. He owns vast properties in Australia, East Uganda, Africa and he has a valuable home in London. His appearance on the stage is merely a matter of amusement and excitement with him. He likes to travel, and his Scotch ancestry has given him the principle that it is better to travel profitably than at great expense. He became a showman through the attention he attracted with his whip while serving with an Australian regiment in the Boer war. His fame was carried to England at the close of the war and before he left south Africa he was offered extensive vaudeville engagements.