

Our good neighbours of Gloucester, will not suffer themselves to be ridiculed. All who are acquainted at Gloucester, know the high credibility of the first witnesses respecting the appearance of the Sea Serpent, and the list of witnesses lately added, are worthy of the same respectful notice as the first. The people of the place are not known for credulity, are not without the greatest experience in marine affairs, and have not derived their accounts from each other. Many have seen the appearance they describe without any prepossession whatever. We however attribute the reception which the report has had, to the singular circumstance that men of so great enterprise in every thing else should have failed of taking the thing of so very extraordinary an appearance.
