Newspapers—the first draft of history

Early American newspapers, often printed by small-town printers, documented the daily life of hundreds of diverse American communities, supported different political parties and recorded both majority and minority views. Among the hundreds of notable titles in Series 1 are the American Mercury (Hartford, Connecticut); American Minerva (New York); Arkansas Weekly Gazette (Little Rock); City Gazette (Charleston, South Carolina); Daily National Intelligencer (Washington, D.C.); Eastern Argus (Portland, Maine); Enquirer (Richmond, Virginia); Evening Post (New York City); Georgia Gazette (Savannah); Massachusetts Spy (Boston and Worcester); New-England Courant (Boston); New-Hampshire Gazette (Portsmouth); Pennsylvania Gazette (Philadelphia); Providence Patriot (Rhode Island); Vermont Gazette (Bennington), and many others.

In cooperation with the American Antiquarian Society

The core of the Readex collection consists of American Antiquarian Society (AAS) founder Isaiah Thomas' own collection of colonial and early national period newspapers and is supplemented by issues added by Thomas' successors at the AAS. Numerous other institutions and historical societies have contributed to the collection, including the Boston Athenaeum, the Connecticut Historical Society, the Connecticut State Library, the Library Company of Philadelphia, the libraries of universities such as Brown and Harvard and private collections. This joint effort has led to the creation of a historical newspaper collection of unparalleled breadth and depth.
